A person centered approach is important when working with job seekers-if what's important to a person about work or meaningful, helpful supports aren't addressed, we risk frustration for the person, the employer, and ourselves. The training will cover various methods of gathering and recording information using person centered tools and life course concepts. Attendees will learn ways to build upon a person's strengths and assets, defining roles and responsibilities in the job search, the importance of relationships and reputations in relation to employment, and how paid supports can be used in combination with the use of technology, community-based, and relationship-based supports.
